A 25 year old recreational facility with 80 unionised and non-unionised employees including long serving employees with seniority and a mix of younger, less experienced staff with limited seniority. For years, management was aware of workplace conflict issue resulting from poor communication that existed between staff, with symptoms including friction between older and younger staff, and inability for staff to change.

Management's response to the workplace conflict had been to keep conflicted parties away from each other, intentionally avoiding the underlying issues resulting the workplace conflicts. Lack of response led to a slow but steady escalation into negative behaviour with reports of bullying and even one incident of physical striking. In short – management was avoiding trying to deal with the root cause of the workplace conflict.
